was quite as rapid as its rise. In little more than two years from the issue of the first free bank note, more than one-half of the circulation was returned and cancelled, leaving at the commencement of my official term a balance of $4,581,833 still outstanding, while the par value of the securities placed in my hands was $4,941,515. So far as the banks were owned by citizens of the State, a creditable exertion was made to protect the bill holder from loss, and most of the institutions thus held sustained themselves with honor, and are still solvent and specie-paying. Those still remaining under the law of 1852, having securities sufficient, at the lowest market value, to redeem their circulation at par in any emergency, while those which have complied with, and have organized under, the law as amended in 1855, have had retained, as will be seen by the accompanying table, 10 per cent. off the market value of their securities, thus placing the specie-paying free banks of Indiana upon the most safe and reliable basis. Those held by foreign capitalists were generally abandoned to their fate, the holders of its notes being compelled to exchange them for depreciated bonds or accept a pro rata of the proceeds when sold. In no case, as applied to foreign bankers, was the principle of individual liability resorted to by the bill holder, and the value of that feature, therefore, cannot be estimated.

The amended act of 1855, while it discourages the operations of speculators and swindlers, affords the public ample guaranty of security. With a strict and vigilant execution of the law, there can be no recurrence of the calamity of 1854–'5. The present banks are believed to be solvent, and shown to be fully able to redeem all their circulation at par, and are known to be in the hands of men of honor and responsibility.

The operations under the amended act will be found in the accompanying exhibit. Further legislation may be necessary in regard to some of the details of the system, but nothing more is required to insure its safety and security.

The new State Bank is authorized to issue twelve millions of dollars; and, as the free banks are restricted to six, the public have in this feature a guaranty of safety against any excessive issue quite as effectual as any other restrictions that can be placed upon the banker. Thus a total issue of eighteen millions of dollars is provided for—a sum sufficient for the commercial transactions of the State.

The interests of community and the rights of our own people would seem also to require that the privilege of free banking should be extended only to citizens of the State. Such a restriction would give character to the circulation at home, and prevent another invasion of straw capitalists, whose only vocation is to plunder the public.
